The Treaty of Nanjing

The Treaty of Nanjing was signed on August 29, 1842, following the defeat of China in the Opium War. With the terms in the Treaty of Nanjing, the door of China was forced open, and the fate of this great empire also began to change. Following the example of Great Britain, a host of European powers, the United States and Japan soon moved in to request "most-favored nation" status from the Chinese government. Thus, a treaty system was formed which tended to protect the interests of foreigners in China. During the late nineteenth century, the Chinese east coast was divided by foreign powers in different concessions in which foreign trading companies, foreign diplomats and residents enjoyed tremendous privileges and immunities. The 100 years since the Opium War were seen as "a century of humiliation" in modern Chinese history. It was not until 1943 that Great Britain and the United States decided to revoke their privileges in extraterritoriality.
